ited to twenty cents or so, for the noontime meal. In the cities this is the almost universal custom, though it has not been accepted by those who exert themselves physically to earn their living. Still, the "lunch" is becoming more and more an American institution. One must almost believe it here to stay.

Now comes the health officer of Cleveland, who tells us that we must "either cut out the lunch or cut out business." His advice is intended for business." His advice is intended for business men, who commonly, in the time they are willing to set apart for that rite do not put aside their business affairs while satisfying the cravings of appetite. He intimates that in the nature of things it is quite impossible for the business man to put himself in a frame of mind, in a few minutes, to do justice to his food, or to permit that reciprocal reward on the part of the food that is the due of all of us. The man who drops his work to hasten to the "eats" emporium, who consciously or subconsciously continues to cerebrate on the subject of business while he is both is successed by those will be a subject of business while he is both is goulash and his apple pie and cheese, and then rushes back to the office to take up the threads of industry where he let go of them, is disging his grave with his teeth. His early death is going to be on his own head.

C. There is nothing particularly new in the Cleveland health officer's "discovery." The late Russell Sage and the more recently lamented Hetty Green, both of whom lived about as long as most of us want to live, tested it to School of Mandolin, Gultar and Banje. covery." The late Russell Sage and the more recently lamented Hetty Green, both of whom lived about as long as most of us want to live, tested it to their own satisfaction, and many others have laid down the rule that food is more or less a poison unless ingested to the accompaniment of agreeable surroundings, pleasing conversation and freedom from care and worry. Especial emphasis has been laid by leading authorities on the desirability of a contented frame of mind in the presence of good things to eat. But why assume that business is disagreeable? Or that the business man is discorted what can surpass the genial manufacture of salt and soda ash. Go get your old pipe. Mix up a little contented? What can surpass the genial glow that pervades body and soul in the prospect of a nice profit about to be turned? For the business man in his office hours and surpass man in his office hours.

The salt beds vary in thickness and number. Thus, the Newburg well showed four layers, which ranged from five to at least fifty feet in thickness, but others wells have shown only one salt layer and in places none at all. From this it appears that the salt beds are not persistent, but thin lenses which may have considerable length or disappear in short distances. The quantity of salt contained in that section is indeed very large and will last indefinitely, says Prof. John A. Bownocker of the department of geology. Ohio State University.

It is "futile as an aid to correct speaking and writing." "Formal grammar," its enemies call the persecuted study, damning it with an epithet. Has anylody ever seen any grammar that was not formal? One might as well speak of a male man as of formal grammar. But when people are resolved to put a heretic to death they stop at nothing. "Grammar is the science," says the veracious textbook, "that teaches how to speak and write the English language correctly." And it begins to teach this valuable art by telling the pale little urchin that it has four departments — orthography, etymology, syntax and prosody. This piece of information usually proves very inspiring to the young. It may be depended upon to set most boys off into a spasm of correct speaking and writing instantaneously.

We are disposed to confide to the
